Abstract:

The essay reconstructs the first thirty-seven hours after the shooting of Charlie Kirk, arguing that official accounts of Tyler Robinson's surrender and arrest are chronologically inconsistent. Part One establishes a fixed "anchor point" — Robinson's booking at 1:58 a.m. on 12 September 2025 — and uses the offence-tracking number (OTN 70090584) to trace the workflow from arrest to court filing. It shows that the 10 p.m. arrest time announced publicly cannot fit the three-and-a-half-hour journey from Washington County to Utah County, implying investigators must have begun southbound travel well before 7 p.m. Part Two examines claims that Robinson was read his Miranda rights at 6:25 p.m. "on the evening of the surrender," suggesting this might have occurred earlier than admitted and in Washington County, supported by his reference to a local attorney. Part Three compares conflicting descriptions of Robinson's clothing and the timing of his first sighting by investigators, noting contradictions between the jail and court copies of the probable-cause affidavit and the later search-warrant narrative. Across all sections, the essay concludes that the official timeline — from confession through surrender to booking — cannot be reconciled with geography, travel time, or documentary evidence, exposing deep instability in the state's account of Robinson's arrest.

In this study we will consider the timing of some key events relating to Tyler Robinson in the first thirty-seven hours after the shooting of Charlie Kirk especially as the official narrative has proved so unstable. In Part One we will try to establish the timing of the arrest by building upon the solid rock of the booking time (when Robinson was put behind bars) by examining the ‘jail copy’ of the booking inmate sheet. This will serve as an alternative way of presenting the argument made in Two Covers for Zealous Monkey. In Part Two we will discuss the merits and demerits of a claim forcefully argued by Baron Coleman to the effect that court records indicating that Robinson was read his rights as early as 6.25 “on the evening of the arrest” should be taken literally (meaning that Robinson was likely in custody far earlier than admitted). Finally, in Part Three we will look at three contradictory accounts of where and when Robinson was first seen (wearing a maroon top and jeans).

Part One: The OTN Anchor Point

Let's begin with what we might call the "OTN" narrative. This refers to Utah's "offence tracking number" that is assigned to a criminal case the moment charges are entered into the state system. In Robinson's case we have at least two documents (Utah County booking sheets) in which the number - OTN 70090584 - is logged, what we can call the "jail copy" and the "court copy." Here is one tweet in which the booking information is presented:

Again, here is a tweet thread in which we made use of AI to create a timeline of the workflow that

Widely reported:

This official time was very widely reported, for example, the BBC:

Tyler Robinson was taken into custody late on Thursday, after a 33-hour manhunt that ended after his father helped persuade him to surrender to police.¹

¹ The jail copy was also leaked two days later and can be found with the PCA in full here:

Or the UK Guardian:

"We got him," the Utah governor said at a press conference, adding that Robinson was arrested and taken into custody in Washington county, which is close to the state border with Arizona, on Thursday at 10pm local time.⁴

And yet:

0 pm time seems to be set in stone, but surprising that would place the arrest later than 10 pm.

A very early tweet:

In the first place, we can cite a very early tweet put out by the same account that was first with the inmate booking sheet:

LindellTV on X: "BREAKING: Charlie Kirk Assassination Suspect Identified Tyler Robinson, 22, of Utah, has been identified as the suspect in the fatal shooting of Charlie Kirk. The identification follows a massive manhunt and was confirmed by @POTUS: @realDonaldTrump. Robinson was reportedly https://t.co/Pr443sBN0p" / X

This tweet contains the claim that "Robinson was reportedly turned in by his father and a local minister in southern Utah before being arrested around 11 PM Thursday night." This information is interesting in that it was put out at around 7:33 am, just 13 minutes after the start of the press conference. Clearly, the 11 pm time is not on-script, and besides, is hardly feasible given the 1:26 am anchor point for Robinson's booking. Moreover, it contains what we can now say was disinformation regarding the identity of the family friend - who we can now state with some confidence was former deputy Mike Mitchell.

Brooksby's story:

Second, we can cite an elaborate story told by Sheriff Nate Brooksby on 17 September at a hastily assembled press conference (after the indictment was published the previous day).⁵ In summary, the sheriff explained the following, that at 8:02 pm precisely he received a call from his former deputy explaining that he knew who Kirk's killer was having been contacted by the parents. Because he had "suicidal ideations" a gentle surrender was negotiated, and immediately Brooksby called Sheriff Mike Smith at Utah County. The deputy then drove Tyler into the office (it was a twenty minute drive) so that the suspect was in Hurricane "within the hour." Meanwhile, Smith at incident command instructed Brooksby to hold the suspect until the lead investigators arrived. He was not to be interviewed, and so Robinson was kept in a room, sipping water, in a quiet and sombre mood, as Brooksby described. After about two and a half hours - which ambiguously might mean from 10:30 pm, or perhaps 11 pm, or even 11:30 pm - the investigators arrived. After this Robinson was taken to Spanish Fork. Problematically, though, Brooksby records two details that are consistent with our first two points, namely, that Robinson was in Utah County by 2 pm, and that the Sheriff's office was three hours North, so "it took a while." Patently, what Brooksby described was impossible.

From the Search Warrant doc:

Third, we find on 11 April 2026 a completely new account emerging. An unsealed court document regarding the search warrants explains:

On 9/11/2025, Sheriff Smith with the Utah County Sheriff's Office received a phone call at approximately 2004 hours from Sheriff Brooksby with the Washington County Sheriff's Office. According to Sheriff Brooksby, he had received a phone call from a former deputy who had
